They respect that some people might be bothered by the display, but she is surprised to know it is gone. She especially noticed the change as several cars continued to pull into the cul-de-sac over the weekend. "It was kind of sad and bittersweet to sit here and know that all these families were looking for a Christmas show that wasn't there anymore," Kari said. Bob says it is important for him to take the high road and respect his neighbor's opinions. He says he second guesses the idea of canceling his display daily, but feels it was his only choice. "Everybody has their own belief systems, everyone has their own way of celebrating Christmas and I want to credit to that," he said. One aspect he says that is non-negotiable are the decorations his TEENren started putting up in the yard. He said he is allowing all eight of them to choose a few lights or decorations to string up, but nothing close to the type of display for which his home became famous. "I have 300,000 lights in the garage I can pull out here. I can make this the biggest display ever to prove a point, but that's not the right message of Christmas," Bob said. Instead, he is focused on continuing his tradition elsewhere. Bob says he plans to move to a new home, possibly in a neighborhood where there is more space for his display to not be a potential distraction or concern. "We'll have a bigger storage space, more Christmas lights and get bigger every year," Bob said. MORE NEWS: Is It Really Better To Give Than To Receive?
