The opening is quite intensive and at times can feel like an olfactive attack as all the notes feel like they are trying to grab your attention all at once but, after a minute or so it settles to reveal a gentle fizz from the bergamot and delicate, fleshy sweetness from the litchi, I can't really smell the peach or the mandarin however. After 10 or so minutes, florals begin to bloom; lily is the most noticable and reminds me ever so slightly of Cartier Baiser Vole except Baiser Vole is considerably more green and sharp, lily of the valley and jasmine smooth the sharp edges of the lily and plum gives a soft fuity facet and helps stop the white florals from becoming too screechy. The florals tone down though and I begin to smell a silky smooth vanilla as the scent dries down, the vanilla and vertiver remind me a little bit of Lancome Hypnose but not as dense and creamy, amber and musk give an extra dimenson to the drydown. Something about this scent reminds me a little of the smell of cooked rice, hence the rice pudding like accord. Despite that, I wouldn't say this is super foody or gourmand. I wouldn't say this is blazingly original or anything like that and I don't know that it's even something I would recommend to others because it's a fairly typical, common warm vanilla scent (the only thing that's slightly different about it on my skin chemistry is the cooked rice note), but I do enjoy this and I think I'll enjoy my pen spray of this while it lasts. , this thing is jacked up to the brim.
