One reviewer wrote: "Drunk, Stoned, or Stupid is not just a game to bring to a party. It is the life of the party! Each card is perfect for someone in the group, and you get to hear your friends tell hilarious stories as they battle to be the one not to keep the card. But the best part about playing this game is the personal element that it adds to game night, which is unlike any other game I have played. Everyone is engaged as they think about the different people sitting around them and, better yet, creatively defend themselves from racking up too many cards that might strike a little too close to home." 6. The Raunchier Version Of Scattergories: Nasty Things. You worked hard to decorate for your Christmas party, and it's time your guests realized it with this fun little game. Print out a list of questions, such as "Who has never had a white Christmas?" and "Who went Christmas caroling last year?" Give each guest a piece of paper and a pen—they'll have to ask people if they fit any of the questions, which breaks the ice and encourages mingling. The first person to get all of the questions answered wins a small prize. Coined as "a party game for horrible people," there's no escaping a giggle fit with this silly card game. Your job when playing this game is to find the best card that fits the question card. It may seem innocent, but once you give the cards a read, you'll understand why it's not. Not only is Cards Against Humanity a fun time, but you really get a taste of your friends' sense of humor by the last round. Have you ever re-gifted something? If so, you might just lose this game. The punishment? Every time you've done something, you have to take a drink of your holiday cocktail. The Spruce is part of the Dotdash publishing family. It's In The Bag is a newer, quicker-paced take on charades, because the cards are written out for you and there are clear-cut directions for each round: For the first round, you describe the card. For the second, you define it using only one word, and for the third, you physically act it out. It's suitable for four or more players at once, and since the topics are inherently clean, you can play it with any age group. The game also comes with a sand timer, and over 2,000 reviewers have given it a 4.6-star rating. 15. An Updated Version Of Charades: It's In The Bag! Buy a bunch of red apples and just one green apple. Hang the apples on long strings from a tree branch (by twisting the strings, you disguise where the green apple is). For each TEEN's turn, blindfold him or her, untwist the apples, and set the youngster toward the branch. If he or she picks the green apple, he or she wins a prize (and the apple). Put up a new green apple and give another TEEN a turn. Rinse and repeat. Dump a bag of candy pumpkins on the table. The challenge is to pick up as many pumpkins with chopsticks as possible, in 60 seconds. Puns of Anarchy is my new go-to game for any event (dinner parties, family reunions, small hangouts), but especially for adult parties. Much like Cards Against Humanity, there's a category card and a judge—but unlike most other card games, these cards are actually mini whiteboards. Add letters, cross things out, throw some words in there, or change them however you see fit in order to fit the category and appeal to the judge. The objective is to create the funniest or most accurate pun at the table, and using the included dry-erase markers, up to six people can play at once. One of the most-backed Kickstarter projects of all time, Unstable Unicorns is a fun card game that'll pit you against your friends. How it works: Up to eight people play specific cards with the goal of getting seven unicorns in their stable (the area in front of you). Each player will also have a few cards they can use to hinder their competition, cards like a magic cards to enhance your own chances of winning, and upgrade and downgrade cards to increase your defenses against your friends, or halt their progress.
