and Hulu and HBO Max and— well, before you know it, an hour has passed and you still don't have a movie to watch. Flicking through streaming platforms and cable channels to find that elusive film everyone can agree on is the original "doomscrolling," but, if you prep in advance, it doesn't have to be that way this year. Similar to sound films, Technicolor movies were also relative rarities in the early 20th century. Films were primarily shot on black and white stock, and filmgoers were accustomed to greyscale pictures. The opposite was true by the 1950s, which is when The Horror of Dracula hit the scene. Hammer Films spared no expense when it adapted Bram Stoker's timeless tale; special effects and ornate gothic sets were specifically created for this film. The Horror of Dracula is also a much more visceral visual experience due to being shot in color. We'd be remiss not to praise Christopher Lee's performance as Count Dracula; he aimed to play the character as a "heroic, erotic and romantic" figure— one that was just as mystifying as he was terrifying. Lee's good friend Peter Cushing starred as Doctor Van Helsing, further elevating the film. And The Horror of Dracula revealed something truly harrowing about vampires: they were dark reflections of human nature. Blacula (1972). Near Dark (1987) While shooting in the desert, Lance Henriksen relieved the boredom between takes by hopping in his car and taking short drives through the desert, still in costume and often staying in character. According to Henriksen and Bill Paxton, the two were stopped by a policeman who became so unnerved questioning Jesse about his speeding that the officer became visibly uncomfortable, stepping back and placing his hand on his firearm. The obviously flustered officer decided to send them on their way rather than write them a ticket. Unusual for a vampire movie, the word "vampire" is never mentioned. . #NearDark #Classic #Horror #Vampires #Vampire #horrorfilm #Horrorfan #Horrorart #HorrorMovies #HorrorMovie #Horrorfanatic #80s #Flick #Horrorlover #Halloweenparty

Luckily, we've rounded up a list of all things Bridgerton -esque: steamy period pieces, soapy series, anachronistic dramas and Shonda Rhimes-produced hits. If you're looking to fill that Bridgerton -shaped void in your life, chances are there's a series or movie on our roundup that will speak to you.

Dickinson With scenes set to the tunes of Lizzo, Mitski and billie eilish, there's no doubt that Apple TV+'s teen period-piece comedy, Dickinson, is anachronistic— and every bit as irreverent as its protagonist, a young Emily Dickinson (Hailee Steinfeld). We're big fans of the series— and Dickinson 's sophomore season hasn't let us down. doesn't go the unnecessary second-season route due to its success and Emmy wins. Conclusion While many think that women don't have much of a presence in the horror movie genre, this list shows that the statement itself could not be more wrong. While women have directed less horror movies than men, the movies directed by women are some of the best horror movies you can see. There are many good reasons to see these movies above, but the fact that women directed them all is another great reason.
