The Swiss firm of Herzog & de Meuron, however, is in the midst of a remarkably subtle commission: the $200 million restoration of New York's Park Avenue Armory. In the words of principal Jacques Herzog, the aim is not to redefine the 1881 landmark but to "reveal the physical traces the building has produced over time." That means selectively removing layers of paint and varnish to highlight the original ornamentation, wallpaper, and lustrous paneling and paring back the 55,000-square-foot drill hall to its exceptional bones. Among the only added flourishes will be ethereal balconies and custom-made light fixtures. Why the restraint? The historic edifice—initially a National Guard outpost that also functioned as an elite social club—contains important 19th-century interiors by such legends as Stanford White, Louis Comfort Tiffany, and the Herter brothers. "We didn't want to lose the soul of the building," says Armory president Rebecca Robertson, who since 2006 has been putting the space to use as a venue for cutting-edge installations. The ongoing transformation is due to take at least three more years. 1Grand Teton National Park in Wyoming If you've ever wanted to see where the buffalo roam, Grand Teton National Park is the place to do it.
