(WCTV) - The traditional Victorian Christmas festival in downtown Thomasville will not happen in 2020, the city announced in a press release. City Manager Alan Carson says although the event will not take place this year, the downtown area will still have a festive atmosphere throughout the holiday season. "It is important that downtown follows the Governor's orders and remains a good partner to our healthcare systems, as well as our businesses. The Governor's current executive orders do not allow for events as large and crowded as we may be used to this time of year," Carson says. "With the input of our board and merchants, we have created a plan that highlights the allure of the season for shoppers and diners to support their favorite businesses, relishing all that downtown has to offer, while still practicing the Centers for Disease Control recommended social distancing and masking measures." The city says downtown merchants created Victorian Christmas as a shopping and dining event. See for yourself why Thomasville, Georgia is the perfect place to get into a holiday mindset.
